Our language consists mainly of the following groups or classes of words: 1st, names of things; 2nd, actions; 3nd, quality; 4th, manner of action; and 5th, places or position. Why could not some man of plain, practical sense write a grammar, showing the government and relation of these classes of words toward each other, in a few simple rules that the station of the child could learn, and remember, and not bealways in doubt as to whether it is violating some vague rules, or exception to the rules in his grammar of the present day.

Wealth and position make coxcombs and dons.

You may always look out for harsh and cruel treatment when the coward wins a victory over you, for cowardice and cruelty are twin brothers.

Conceit and self-confidence always act in a reverse ratio to good sense. Hence, the bigger the fool, the greater conceit and self-confidence.

Curiosity, when like the honey bee, busyin gathering sweets from all the flowers in creation, is a very commendable virtue; but, when it becomes a house fifty, buzzing round and bespotting all the recesses of private families, it becomes one of the most contemptible vices known to human nature.
